Introduction. The idea of social robots has been inseparable from that of robots since its inception. In Karel Čapek’s 1920 play “R.U.R. (Rossum’s Universal Robots),” from which science and engineering inherited the term, the human-like artifacts called “robots” are artificial social agents that function as secretary, postman or factory workers (Čapek, 1920/2004).

Robotics - University of Birmingham

Bats use sound to map their environment. They emit sounds and their brains process the received echoes. Using this sense, which is called echolocation, bats succeed at one of the hardest problems in robotics—the need to move in an unfamiliar environment and map it. Many studies have tried explaining how bats do this, and we decided to build the Robot—a robot that navigates the world and ...
