I've spent enough time since digging more deeply to understand that difference now, but to some extent, "The Ecstasy of Influence" can be read as an episodic treatise written by that novel's partially self-aware narrator. It's an autobiography by accident and a fiction by virtue of the fact that Lethem embraces a localized approach to truth.

In Jonathan Lethem’s essay collection, The Ecstasy of Influence, he suggests that “the voices in so-called ‘nonfictions’ were themselves artful impostures, arrangements of sentences...that mimicked the presence of a human being offering sincerely intended and honestly useful guidance into this or that complicated area of human thought or experience.” It is the fictional element in nonfiction, Lethem reminds us, that makes the autobiographical question moot.
