The conceptual schema describes the Database structure of the whole database for the community of users. This schema hides information about the physical storage structures and focuses on describing data types, entities, relationships, etc. This logical level comes between the user level and physical storage view.

DBMS Schemas: Internal, Conceptual, External

The conceptual schema is related to the internal schema through a conceptual-internal mapping. This enables the DBMS to find the actual record or combination of records in physical storage that constitute a logical record in the conceptual schema, together with any constraints to be enforced on the operations for that logical record. It also allows any differences in entity names, attribute names, attribute order, and data types to be resolved.
