Where Stanford meets Silicon Valley: universities must consider ethics of tech. Stanford University student Kiran Sridhar explores the role that higher education must play in mitigating the negative effects of technology. The thin line separating Stanford University and Silicon Valley is hardly a secret: many students drop out to found tech ventures, and many professors and administrators serve as board members and advisers to companies both large and small.

It appeals to the Silicon Valley narrative to have a saviour riding in from outside higher education to save it. If the influence of those inside higher education such as Wiley, Downes, Siemens, etc is acknowledged then that weakens the appeal of the story. Kernohan performed a semantic analysis of eleven popular MOOC articles. Taking Kernohan’s articles to conduct simple word counts the word ‘disrupt’ (or derivative) occurred 12 times, ‘revolution’ 16, and ‘company’ 17.
