Theological Tractates The Consolation Of

The Loeb Classical Library first published Boethius' Consolation of Philosophy and Theological Tractates in 1918, in a critical edition of the Latin text specially prepared by the editors, and a translation of the Consolation taken over, with some revision, from a translation dating to 1609; the numerous poems in the Consolation are rendered felicitously, in rhyming English verse, but the translation of the prose is somewhat clumsy.

Boethius, Theological Tractates. The Consolation of ...

The Consolation of Philosophy is the main draw here (although the Theological Tractates are also useful). The Consolation is a wonderful little book written by Boethius in prison while awaiting execution. He seeks to understand and to explain how his unjust lot in life can be compatible with the love and foreknowledge of all-powerful God.

During his brief life of forty-four years, Boethius authored and translated numerous important works and treatises on the Christian faith. Considered by Stewart and Rand to be “the last of the Roman philosophers and the first of the scholastic theologians,” an imprisoned Boethius penned The Consolation of Philosophy, his best known work, before being executed in 524 A. D.

Boethius: The Theological Tractates and the Consolation of ...

Boethius's most famous work is The Consolation of Philosophy. The tone and content of the work are distinctively Stoical. I have said in another review that Marcus Aurelius's "Meditations" is Stoicism for monarchs, whereas "The Imitation of Christ" by Thomas A Kempis is Stoicism for monks. If so, then "Consolation" is Stoicism for martyrs.
