The cross area of propeller edge is an airfoil segment which is ordinarily differing from tip to hub in terms of chord or twist distribution. There are many variables for designing the propeller such as pitch angle, flow angle, chord distribution at the blade span and twist distribution. Blade elements theory will be used for designing the propeller.

For accurate design solution, the propeller shaft was analyzed using FEM techniques (ANSYS package). The propeller shaft was geometrically modeled using FEM “3D-shell99 element and solid46 layered element”. To check all failure modes, linear static analysis, vibration Eigen value analysis, buckling analysis and harmonic analysis were done.

For general propeller design work, the ISO specifications usually serve as the criteria for assessment. ISO 484-1 (2015) and ISO 484-2 (2015), which now supersede the earlier 1981 standards, define the requirements for propellers greater than 2.5 m and between 0.80 and 2.5 m, respectively. In certain cases, such as naval propellers, the purchasers of the propeller may impose their own tolerance specifications and methods of assessment: for example, the US Navy standard drawing method.
