Along with Wallerstein, geographer and social theorist David Harvey (1935-) is the pre-eminent Marxist theorist of globalization. In his bestselling The Condition of Postmodernity, Harvey became one of the first theorists to link globalization with fundamental changes in our experiences of time and space. Harvey coined the term "time-space compression" to refer to the way the acceleration of economic activities leads to the destruction of spatial barriers and distances.

Space exploration does not stand apart from the globalization process. It is part and parcel of the thing it has magnified. The globalization process, therefore, requires us to re-think the exploration of space. Societies leapfrogging to advanced industrial status like China and India are getting in on outer space production.

Globalization of Space - The Astrosociological Approach

The structural opposition between globalization 'winners' and 'losers' is expected to constitute potentials for political mobilization within national political contexts, the mobilization of which is expected to give rise to two intimately related dynamics: the transformation of the basic structure of the national political space and the strategic repositioning of the political parties within the transforming space.

Doreen Massey maintained this idea about time-space compression in her discussion of globalization and its effect on our society. Similar to Virilio, she stated that because our world is "speeding up" and "spreading out", time-space compression is more prevalent than ever as internationalization takes place. Cultures and communities are merged during time-space compression due to rapid growth and change, as "layers upon layers" of histories fuse together to shift our ideas of what the ...
