Approaches to Left Atrial Appendage Exclusion

The left atrial appendage (LAA) is derived from the left wall of the primary atrium, which forms during the fourth week of embryonic development. It has developmental, ultrastructural, and physiological characteristics distinct from the left atrium proper. The LAA lies within the confines of the pericardium in close relation to the free wall of the left ventricle and thus its emptying and filling may be significantly affected by left ventricular function.

Left Atrial Appendage Closure Devices Percutaneous LAA occlusion is a nonpharmacological alternative to oral anticoagulation which has been studied in a few clinical trials. Oral anticoagulation (OAC) has been shown to be effective in reducing stroke risk but is associated with increased risk of bleeding.²For patients with AF who are poor candidates for OAC, left atrial appendage closure (LAAC) has been shown to be a viable alternative for prevention of stroke.³With the increasing frequency of LAAC, challenging clinical scenarios are being encountered that may limit the delivery of this important therapy.
