Javascript Concurrency

JavaScript has a concurrency model
based on an event loop, which is responsible for executing the code, collecting and processing events, and executing queued sub-tasks. This model is quite different from models in other languages like C and Java.

Concurrency model and the event loop - JavaScript | MDN

JavaScript concurrency model is different from other languages like C and Java, and it is based on an “event loop.” In this model, we run an operation and give it a callback function that is going to be executed later when the first operation is completed. This way, the call stack is not blocked and other operations can be added to it.

JavaScript Concurrency: Avoiding the Sequential Trap - DEV

The reason that concurrency in JavaScript is such an important idea is because the web is a concurrent place, both from a very high level and an implementation detail level. In other words, the web is concurrent because at any given point in time, there's oodles of data flowing over the miles of fiber, which encase the globe.

JavaScript
Concurrency | Packt
Because JavaScript doesn't have real concurrency, simple checks and mutations of that variable are sufficient to safely control the concurrency. ES6 async/await syntax makes it easy to safely wrap the passed-in function proc. Whether proc succeeds or fails, the inFlight variable is reset when it is done.

How to Correctly Manage Concurrency in JavaScript

JavaScript Concurrency Model and Event Loop Javascript runtime is single threaded which means that it can execute one piece of code at a time. In order to understand the concurrency model and the event loop in Javascript we have to first get to know some common terms that are associated with it.

JavaScript

Concurrency Model and Event Loop

More precisely, in JavaScript, concurrency is achieved through a mechanism called the event loop. The event loop is effectively an endless loop that is triggered from messages that get put onto a queue. This queue waits for messages from asynchronous functions and runs each of the functions to completion.

How to Reason About JavaScript's Concurrency Model with ...

To explain the problem with your original code snippet: Javascript is single-threaded (unless you are using web workers). You can use events, callbacks, and setTimeout to achieve an illusion of concurrency, but what you are really doing is telling the runtime to execute your callback function at some future time on the single execution thread.

Javascript Concurrency Control - Stack Overflow

The presence of web-workers justifies further that javascript can be multi-threaded, in the sense that someone can create code in javascript that will run on a separate thread. However: web-workers do not carry the problems of traditional threads who can share execution context.
