It's the essence of biodynamic gardening. Unlike organic gardening, the tenets of biodynamic gardening appear to lack a genuine scientific basis. Like organic gardening, it promotes the use of and re-use of organic materials and manures and excludes the use of synthetic fertilisers and pesticides. It treats the garden, or plot, as an indivisible whole, and includes the use of cover crops, green manures and crop rotation.

The biodynamic allotment / RHS Gardening

Though more complex in some ways, biodynamic gardening is a natural extension of organic gardening. Both share the same passion for producing delicious, chemical-free food, caring for soils, bees and wildlife, and champion biodiversity and health. Sometimes described as ‘organic plus’, the biodynamic approach is both down to earth and spiritual.
