Applications of the SPIDR® system for reservoir engineers includes: Pressure Build-up work to derive a P^* (reservoir pressure) number; Limits testing (determining reservoir size and volume)

Reservoir Engineers - Halliburton

For any use of surface pressure data for pressure transient analysis, whether via a pressure build-up, multi-rate or injection fall-off, it is of paramount importance to utilize a quartz type transducer. This is because these transducers advantages in pressure resolution, data frequency, stability in changing thermal conditions, etc.

Reservoir Testing & Analysis -

Halliburton

Halliburton has been developing technology for surface to downhole pressure measurement for the past 29 years in parallel with my own efforts to develop a capillary wave based transient model. During those years the proof of concept has been to produce blind maps that compare well and in detail with seismic imaging.

Testimonials - Halliburton

Pressure transient test interpretation is aided by knowledge from other disciplines, such as the current understanding of reservoir structure and a knowledge of fluid phase behavior. As with other reservoir characterization techniques, it is important to seek a concept of the reservoir that is consistent with data from all sources.
