Competency to stand trial is legally unrelated to the defendant's mental state at the time of the alleged crime. In other words, the issue of competency relates to the defendant's state of mind during criminal proceedings, not during the commission of the crime.

Competency to Stand Trial | Nolo
Criminal Competency Evaluation. The question of whether or not a given individual possess the ability to rationally and factually perform a task or make a decision arises in both criminal and civil contexts. One example of a capacity question applied in a criminal setting is competence to stand trial. United States law holds that individuals have a right to know what they are accused of, to have a defense attorney if they so choose, and to assist their attorney in their defense.
