All Chinese investment treaties afford MFN obligations to foreign investment. 73 Hence, foreign investors subject to investment protections of earlier Chinese BITs are able to enjoy the enhanced protection of newer treaties through invoking the MFN clause, at least to a substantial degree, and if no imposed restrictions or exceptions provided otherwise. 74 Recent Chinese BITs tend to extend the MFN obligation to the admission stage.

China’s Bilateral Investment Treaties | SpringerLink

Introduction. International law on foreign investment finds its origins in the international law on the treatment of aliens and has long been regarded as an instrument of Western dominance over and exploitation of developing countries. In the aftermath of decolonization, both substantive and procedural rules on the treatment of foreign investment were at the center of developing countries’ struggle to gain control over their natural resources and establish a New International Economic Order.
