Catalysis Of Organic Reactions Chemical Industries [EPUB]
Catalysis is the process of increasing the rate of a chemical reaction by adding a substance known as a catalyst. Catalysts are not consumed in the catalyzed reaction but can act repeatedly. Often only very small amounts of catalyst are required. The global demand for catalysts in 2010 was estimated at approximately US$29.5 billion.

Catalysis - Wikipedia
In process chemistry, the catalysis of a certain reaction can be mediated either by a biological or chemical catalyst. Enzymes and whole cells make up the biological group, while the chemical group can be said to include all non-enzymatic catalysts. Some reactions can be catalysed by both groups of catalysts, while the catalyst used is not interchangeable in other.

Chemical catalysis | SpinChem
This chapter provides an introduction to the mechanism of catalysis. A catalyst is a substance that increases the rate of a chemical reaction without itself being changed in the process. In general, there are heterogeneous, homogeneous, and biological catalysts. Most reactions run by organic chemists are in the liquid phase.
