Resonance structures are used when a single Lewis structure cannot fully describe the bonding; the combination of possible resonance structures is defined as a resonance hybrid, which represents the overall delocalization of electrons within the molecule. In general, molecules with multiple resonance structures will be more stable than one with fewer and some resonance structures contribute more to the stability of the molecule than others - formal charges aid in determining this.

The term resonance structures in the context of Lewis structures refers to two or more valid structures that represent a molecule or ion that has some level of π bonding. Since Lewis structures always depict electrons as localized, no single Lewis structure correctly depicts the delocalization of π electrons that is observed experimentally.

Resonance Structures and Delocalized π Orbitals. Block:

One good pattern to remember is that resonance structures involve a π bond, one way or the other. It is either making a bond or breaking a bond or both. Therefore, whenever asked to draw a resonance structure(s), look for a π bond. You can't have resonance structures with having a π bond involved.
