During vertebrate development the eyes arise as evaginations from the developing diencephalon (FIG. 4; animated online). Depressions called optic grooves form on each side of the rostral neural plate (FIG. 4b), and as the neural plate folds upwards and inwards (FIG. 4b,c), meeting and closing-over to form the neural tube, these growing regions balloon outwards (FIG. 4d) and are now termed optic vesicles.

that the two eye fields of vertebrates are generated from a single eye anlage, the generation of two eye fields from one was controversial for many decades. For example, Spemann (Spemann, 1938) favored the hypothesis that the two eyes are generated from two independent eye fields, while his major opponent at that time, Adelmann (1929), pioneered the notion that the two eyes are generated from a single eye anlage.

Regulation of vertebrate eye development by Rx genes

These results, together with the early expression of vertebrate Pax6 genes in the anterior neural plate (Grindley et al., 1995, Hirsch and Harris, 1997, Li et al., 1994, Loosli et al., 1998, Püschel et al., 1992, Walther and Gruss, 1991) has led to the suggestive 'master control gene hypothesis' for Pax6, as key regulator of eye development conserved throughout bilaterian evolution (Gehring and Ikeo, 1999, Halder et al., 1995b, Quiring et al., 1994).

An eye on eye development - ScienceDirect

In most vertebrates and some molluscs, the eye works by allowing light to enter and project onto a light-sensitive panel of cells, known as the retina, at the rear of the eye. The cone cells (for colour) and the rod cells (for low-light contrasts) in the retina detect and convert light into neural signals for vision.
