Risk Management. The engineering risk management process involves five components. In a project management plan, each of these could have their own heading. The components are:
Planning for risk.
Identifying risks.
Analyzing risks.
Developing risk response strategies.
Monitoring and controlling risks.

Risk management is a continuous, forward-looking process that is applied to anticipate and avert risks that may adversely impact the project, and can be considered both a project management project management and a systems engineering systems engineering process. A balance must be achieved on each project in terms of overall risk management ownership, implementation, and day-to-day responsibility between these two top-level processes.
