Globalization, Social Capital and Inequality: Contested ...

The increase in inequality is U-shaped in the aggregate productivity level of the country. ² The intuition is that the more (less) productive countries specialise in capital-intensive intermediates, accumulate more (less) capital and end-up with a larger (smaller) share of capital income in the new steady state. This implies that the largest increases in within-country inequality will be in countries with very high (or low) productivity because they experience the largest changes in capital.
