Capillary electrophoresis (CE) is a powerful analytical technique that is widely used in research and development and in quality control of pharmaceuticals. Many reports of highly efficient separations and methods have been published over the past 15 years. CE offers several advantages over high-pressure or high-performance liquid chromatography (HPLC).

The book, Capillary Electrophoresis Methods for Pharmaceutical Analysis, Volume 9, is planned to provide the busy pharmaceutical scientist a complete yet concise reference guide for utilizing the versatility of CE in new drug development and QC. Each of the chapters has been written by selected experts in the field to provide the reader with an in-depth understanding of CE theory, instrumentation, methodologies, regulations, applications, and recent developments.

Two of the most important modes of CE, which will be discussed in this chapter, are capillary zone electrophoresis (CZE) and micellar electrokinetic chromatography (MEKC). CZE is the simplest and the most widely used mode of CE. The separation mechanism of the analytes is based on their difference in charge-to-size ratios and their difference in electrophoretic mobilities, which, in turn, result in different velocities.

Capillary Electrophoresis Methods for Pharmaceutical ...

Capillary electrophoresis is a family of electrokinetic separation methods performed in submillimeter diameter capillaries and in micro- and nanofluidic channels. Very often, CE refers to capillary zone electrophoresis, but other electrophoretic techniques including capillary gel electrophoresis, capillary isoelectric focusing, capillary isotachopheresis and micellar electrokinetic chromatography belong also to this class of methods. In CE methods, analytes migrate through electrolyte solutions
