To say that emotions have structures (or a structure) is to reject the view that they are merely amorphous “ feelings” or that they have no order, logic, or rationality. On the contrary, emotions are structured in several ways: by their underlying neurology, by the judgments and evaluations that enter into them, by the behaviour that expresses or manifests them, and by the larger social contexts in which they occur.

Two strategies to achieve this understanding are (1) to examine how socio-emotional functioning is associated with social interactions and relationships, and (2) to examine how socio-emotional functioning develops in the culture (e.g., what developmental outcomes it leads to). 6 These strategies can be used in both within-cultural and cross-cultural studies. An examination of the social ...
