The study was designed to investigate the format for symbolology on HUDs and the performance effects of using conformal and partially conformal symbolology to support the pilots' tasks. In addition, two different methods were investigated for supporting the pilots' transition between the task of flying and the task of landing.

Location of flight symbolology was manipulated head-up vs. head-down while controlling for optical distance and symbolology format. Pilots were assigned to one of two symbolology sets, conformal and non-conformal. Each pilot flew half of the trials with the symbology presented in a head-up location and half with the symbology located head-down.

symbology is non-conformal in nature. The command-guidance cue is similar to the command-guidance symbology commonly used for maintaining flight path in the air [5]. The inner circle, the command-guidance cue, moves left and right in relation to the outer circle (fixed aircraft reference symbol) based on taxiway centerline deviation and deviation rate.

In two experiments we examined a number of related factors postulated to influence head-up display (HUD) performance. We addressed the benefit of reduced scanning and the cost of increasing the number of elements in the visual field by comparing a superimposed HUD with an identical display in a head-down position in varying visibility conditions. We explored the extent to which the ...

The results revealed that, for flight path control, there was generally a cost associated with head-down location. The magnitude of this cost was relatively larger for conformal than for non-conformal symbology.
