Hegel views Spinoza's measured and purely rational usage of negation as eliciting a too formal, and restrictive meaning, being associated solely with those finite modes, which have a determined existence (and can, therefore, contain contradiction or difference), but not with substance itself, which remains resolutely positive and expansive (p.115-17): Spinoza's philosophy cannot conceive the negation of the negation or, therefore, the very movement of life and matter. Indeed, it is this ...
