Transfer of embryos. In cattle, embryos are routinely transferred to the uterine horn. This is because nearly all embryos are recovered non-surgically from the uterus, and therefore should be returned to this site. Furthermore, it is much easier to transfer embryos to the uterus than to the oviduct.

Training manual for embryo transfer in cattle

Embryo transfer (ET) is the process of removing one or more embryos (fertilized eggs) from the reproductive tract of a donor female and transferring them to one or more recipient female. The entire process involves breeding a donor cow (usually by A.I.), flushing embryos from the donor and injecting embryos into recipient cows.

Embryo Transfer in Cattle - FSA3119

An embryo transfer is a procedure done to multiply the number of cattle to expand either the herd or meet market demands. It can also be done if a farmer wants to use the best bulls for their best cows. This makes it easier for cattle herders to double the number of cattle they can produce since most females will only produce one calf per year.
