The title of Confessions of a Young Novelist, Umberto Eco's new book, is characteristically sly. Eco is not exactly wet behind the ears—he will turn 80 next year—but as he reminds the reader on the first page, he did not publish his first novel, The Name of the Rose, until 1980. "Thus," he explains, "I consider myself a very young novelist, who has so far published only five novels and will publish many more in the next fifty years."

These lectures are entitled Confessions of a Young Novelist—and one might well ask why, since I am marching toward my seventy-seventh year. But it so happens that I published my first novel, The Name of the Rose, in 1980, which means that I started my career as a novelist a mere twenty-eight years ago. Thus, I consider myself a very young and certainly promising novelist, who has so far published only five novels and will publish many more in the next fifty years.
