The decision of the Supreme Court of England and Wales to uphold a privacy injunction granted to a celebrity, known only as PJS, caused significant media excitement in May of this year. The British press overwhelmingly took the view that the injunction was a strike against both free speech and common sense and whilst PJS has the decision he sought, it can be viewed as a pyrrhic victory when the immense publicity surrounding the case is taken into account.

Privacy injunctions and the English courts

In a media law context, injunctions are most often granted to prevent the publication of private, confidential, defamatory and/or inaccurate information. They are also granted to require the removal of online content. In recent years injunctions have also increasingly been granted to prevent harassment.
