Mud, (also called cob, chalk bats, and wychart in some regions) walls and buildings are built using mixtures of clay soils, chalk, and sand, with straw to bind it all together. They are found in many places around England, often associated with picturesque cottages or rural villages. Mud walls and buildings are a charming vernacular tradition that sheds light on the historic use of locally sourced natural materials.

The City of Dubrovnik is completely surrounded with defensive walls and forts including the Old Port in length of 1940 meters (6365 feet). The walls were built systematically during the centuries in times when there was a danger of foreign attacks lured over the Dubrovnik Republic and the City. The walls are still functional today thanks to Dubrovnik citizens who maintained them and built upon them when it was necessary and Dubrovnik diplomacy who was able to obviate the enemy threats to ...

The wall was constructed from mudbricks and fired bricks to a width of 6-10 metres and was lined by an earthen bank and ditch. Adjacent to the wall was 38 fortresses constructed at intervals mainly laid out in a square plan with a standardised barracks design, with estimates of the total garrison for the wall numbering between 15,000 to 36,000 soldiers (based on a study of the fort's barrack blocks).
