Abstract. In April 1992, in an article for Newsweek entitled 'Don't Undo Our Work', Margaret Thatcher claimed that during her terms as prime minister 'we reclaimed our heritage' (Thatcher, 1992). As we have seen, her platform after 1984 was built upon the slogan of 'Victorian values', a catchphrase that concealed an expansive programme for quite revolutionary change behind the ...

A[ntonia] S[usan] Byatt has a distinctive voice and an equally distinctive view of the role of the modern novelist. She published her first novel, Shadow of a Sun, in 1964. At first overshadowed by her sister Margaret Drabble, a more popular novelist, she didn't receive wide recognition until the publication of Possession: A Romance in 1990. By then she had produced four novels, a collection of short stories, and two works of academic criticism.

Byatt is on occasion scathing about the 'woman's novel' and has described in her 1991 preface to The Shadow of the Sun her early fear of the form 'as an immoral devouring force'. Nonetheless, her fiction is structured around the dilemma which Radner sees as central to the woman's novel, defining it in terms of its content and form.
