Economist Don Boudreaux argues that free trade is about more than just "stuff," it's about cultural diversity: One of the chief concerns expressed by anti-globalization activists is that freer trade leads to worldwide cultural homogeneity. Paris, France, according to this view, will become just like Paris, Texas, and both will be dreary.

Under free trade the loss may become more salient for individuals who keep on consuming the same cultural good after trade liberalization. When, however, both countries end up culturally homogenous in the same network under free trade, then one returns to the traditional result that trade liberalization dominates autarky.

Trade and Cultural Diversity - ScienceDirect

In a Ricardian model of international trade the paper shows that (i) trade is not Pareto inferior to autarky if the free trade equilibrium is unique, (ii) trade is not Pareto superior to autarky if the world is culturally diverse under free trade, but can be if the world is culturally homogenous, (iii) and when multiple free trade equilibria exist everybody in a country can lose from free trade if that country is culturally homogenous under autarky.
