The "word of thought" (m ē mr ā d-tar ' ī t ā), corresponding to the middle Platonic and Stoic logos (or, according to Bardaisan ' s disciples, a set of three kinds of spiritual atoms), is sent by God to separate darkness from the entities. From what is still defiled, the logos establishes the world in such a way as to be progressively purified.

It is his position that careful work with the earliest available manuscripts is the best starting point for rediscovering early liturgical practices. This piece is a contribution to that endeavor. It provides an introduction, translation and commentary on a previously unstudied text (B.M. Add. 14528), which provides deeper insight not only into practice, but also into the conception of the canon.
