Yamaha used the XS500's design strengths in order to get a good horsepower without establishing a positively giddy redline and gathering a lot of horsepower immediately under it. Certainly the 500 does have poke—the engine develops about 1:3 horsepower per cubic inch; except for the GS550, the 550cc Yamaha twin produces as much or more horsepower than any of its competitors.

Where Relic Motorcycles have really excelled in this build is the look, the clever body work and the challenge that is dealing with the XS500's rather square lines. Rather than fight them or simply fit another tank Relic have used clever colour selection and subtle paint work to bring out the best in the Yamaha design.
