The 'Humber Keel' was the most common type of vessel plying the larger rivers using a large square sail for propulsion. On the smaller rivers and later the canals propulsion started with man power then horse drawn until steam power came along, but the same low draught keel without the sail or with a mast which could be lowered was used so as to navigate the river with bridges.

Humber Keel and Sloop

The Keelmen of Tyne and Wear were a group of men who worked on the keels, large boats that carried the coal from the banks of both rivers to the waiting collier ships. Because of the shallowness of both rivers, it was difficult for ships of any significant draught to move up river and load with coal from the place where the coal reached the riverside. Thus the need for shallow-draught keels to transport the coal to the waiting ships. The keelmen formed a close-knit and colourful community on bot

Eddie Sanderson's father, from a long line of keelmen, wrote and sang this song. We got it from a type-written sheet passed on to Steve by his mother-in-law, Eileen Sherburn, Goff's wife and Chris's mother. Goff actually crewed on the keels just after the war on the same waters as the Sandersons, before becoming a tugman.
