This 1946 essay is notable for at least two reasons: one, it gives us a neat little autobiography detailing Orwell's development as a writer; and two, it includes four 'motives for writing' which break down as egoism (wanting to seem clever), aesthetic enthusiasm (taking delight in the sounds of words etc.), the historical impulse (wanting to record things for posterity), and the political purpose (wanting to 'push the world in a certain direction').
