Technology Opens the Door for Better Sounds Faster. In many ways, the internet has lowered barriers for sound designers to find the exact music and noises they need to move a production. In an interview with Music Theatre Today, Kai Harada explains exactly how technology has changed sound design in the past 10 years. In the old days, if a director wanted a new sound effect it would take a whole day — Harada had to call studio libraries and wait for them to mail a few CDs to review.
