By applying such collations to SQL operations, an application can perform string comparisons and matching in a case-insensitive way, independent of the language of the data. With the new Oracle Database 12 c Release 2 (12.2) ability to declare collations for columns, you can declare a column to always be compared in a case-insensitive way. The column collation, if not specified explicitly, is inherited from a table default collation, which in turn is inherited from a schema default collation.
