As the simplest form of a jet engine after ramjet and the earliest jet engine concept, pulsejets are very cheap and quite powerful, but very fuel-inefficient and extremely loud. Their specific fuel consumption is about 2 (units of fuel per one unit of thrust in an hour), which is twice of a pure turbojet.

A pulse jet is as inefficient as the dickens in comparison with internal combustion or turbine engines, although a good one can squeeze a lot of flying out of its fuel load.

Why Doesn't The Military Use Pulse Jet Engines?

How a pulsejet works is actually very simple. With a valveless design (which this is), fuel and air are directed into a combustion chamber. Once the fuel has ignited, flame exits the exhaust tube and essentially creates a vacuum in the combustion chamber which draws more fuel and fresh air in. The ignition source would then ignite the fresh fuel and air for continued combustion.

The origins of the Argus As 014 lie in 1928, when Munich inventor Paul Schmidt began work on a new design of pulse jet engine. Schmidt received a patent on his design in 1931 and received support from the German Air Ministry in 1933. In 1934, along with Professor Georg Madelung, Schmidt proposed a "flying bomb" to be powered by his pulse jet to the Ministry and received a development contract the following year.

A pulsejet engine is a type of jet engine in which combustion occurs in pulses. A pulsejet engine can be made with few or no moving parts, and is capable of running statically. Pulsejet engines are a lightweight form of jet propulsion, but usually have a poor compression ratio, and hence give a low specific impulse. One notable line of research of pulsejet engines includes the pulse detonation engine, which involves repeated detonations in the engine, and which can potentially give high compress
