His research is in line with how enforcement is an essential component of the various frameworks in welfare economics, yet his work on ‘Social Choice Theory’ is the most interesting: it shows how we, as different agents (in the society) from different backgrounds, achieve a certain level of social optimum and therefore, overall welfare. This welfare may not be at the most optimum/efficient level, it may not be at the highest, most desirable level at all; but then you know, something, on ...
