Confounding Variables | Definition, Examples and Controls

Confounding, sometimes referred to as confounding bias, is mostly described as a ‘mixing’ or ‘blurring’ of effects. 1 It occurs when an investigator tries to determine the effect of an exposure on the occurrence of a disease (or other outcome), but then actually measures the effect of another factor, a confounding variable. As most medical studies attempt to investigate disease etiology and causal relationships, confounding is regarded as undesirable, as it obscures the ‘real ...

Confounding: What it is and how to deal with it ...

A confounding variable is independently associated with both the risk factor (exposure) and the disease (outcome). Because of the dual association, the confounding variable creates a false association between the risk factor and disease or can exaggerate or hide a true association.
