Texts in Middle English (as opposed to French or Latin) begin as a trickle in the 13th Century, with works such as the debate poem "The Owl and the Nightingale" (probably composed around 1200) and the long historical poem known as Layamon's "Brut" (from around the same period). Most of Middle English literature, at least up until the flurry of literary activity in the latter part of the 14th Century, is of unknown authorship.
