Marine food webs — Science Learning Hub

Early theoretical studies predicted that restricted diet within a food web lowers community stability (MacArthur 1955). Indeed virtual food webs with large numbers of weak, ephemeral linkages are more stable, and thus more persistent, than those with few strong, requisite linkages (Polis 1994, McCann and Hastings 1997).

Abstract. Public concern over biodiversity loss is often rationalized as a threat to ecosystem functioning, but biodiversity-ecosystem functioning (BEF) relations are hard to empirically quantify at large scales. We use a realistic marine food-web model, resolving species over five trophic levels, to study how total fish production changes with species richness.
