To do a reverse sear on charcoal you have to light the fire and then use up the best and most hottest minutes of the coals cooking indirect, then try to sear it over the coals when they've burned half out. The whole idea just has never made any sense to me. Plus, I've been grilling steaks for years with the sear first, then to temp indirect.

In fact, the intention was not to compare the sous vide cooking with the Reverse Searing than to compare a reverse searing made in traditional mode, through a charcoal grill (indirect mode, 30°C), with a more modern one, through sous vide, to see if the traditional cooking could make some benefits to some extent.
