Accounting practices are important for bank valuations for two reasons. First, the assets held by banks are typically in the form of financial instruments (loans, bonds and other securities as well as derivatives) that have well defined cash flows. The majority of bank assets (loans, investments and other assets) are reported at amortised cost.

Bank valuation and price-to-book ratios (PBRs)

Both valuation models are based on discounting either future cash flows (ECF) or the periodic residual income (RI).
