Post-excavation analysis constitutes processes that are used to study archaeological materials after an excavation is completed. Since the advent of "New Archaeology" in the 1960s, the use of scientific techniques in archaeology has grown in importance. This trend is directly reflected in the increasing application of the scientific method to post-excavation analysis. The first step in post-excavation analysis should be to determine what one is trying to find out and what techniques can be used

Post-excavation analysis - Wikipedia

The Standard applies to any archaeological project that involves the collection and analysis of pottery, e.g. excavation, field evaluation, watching brief and surface recovery. The Standard also applies to the analysis and re-interpretation of pottery studied previously and now in storage, for instance in a museum collection. 1.3 Structure

A Standard for Pottery Analysis in Archaeology

We undertake isotopic analysis (carbon and nitrogen) of a variety of materials on a semi-commercial basis; that is, where there is usually an element of collaborative research interest, and where we recover our costs for our contribution and when we have spare capacity in the laboratory. The types of sample analysed include: bone and dentine collagen, human and animal protein tissue samples (keratin, chitin, soft tissue collagen), plant samples (modern and carbonised archaeological botanics
