IP routing not enabled - Cisco Community
There are two ways for the packet to get routed to the destination: 1. routed via pure IP address. 2. routed via the MPLS label, which is imposed by the PE router. If the packet is checked by RIB first, then the packet should be forwarded without imposing any labels to the next lop.

Also, apart from the base routing tables, we will focus on Cisco Express Forwarding (CEF), the currently used, high-speed forwarding mechanism for IP packets across the network (s). In the last article where we discussed the MPLS basics, we learned that the data packets flow through the MPLS network using the concept of labels.

Cisco Express Forwarding (CEF), Routing Information Base ...
The router will check the routing table first. There is no point checking ARP table for the destination address, if it is not on the directly attached network. So, once the router establishes the next hop IP address for that destination, it starts the forwarding preparation at layer 2.

How does a router forward packets inside a LAN ... - Cisco
THE CEF PROCESS FLOW: When a packet enters the router, the router strips off the Layer 2 information. The router looks up the destination IP address in the CEF table (FIB), and it makes a forwarding decision. The result of this forwarding decision points to one adjacency entry in the adjacency table.

INTRODUCTION TO CISCO EXPRESS FORWARDING (CEF) | Octa Networks
The Cisco IP routing table is not a flat database. The routing table is actually a hierarchical structure that is used to speed up the lookup process when locating routes and forwarding packets. Components of the IPv6 routing table are similar to the IPv4 routing table.
