Economic integration, process in which two or more states in a broadly defined geographic area reduce a range of trade barriers to advance or protect a set of economic goals. The level of integration involved in an economic regionalist project can vary enormously from loose association to a sophisticated, deeply integrated, transnationalized economic space. It is in its political dimension that economic integration differs from the broader idea of regionalism in general.

Geographical location of industry is affected by trade policy. For example, when a country is closed to trade, metropolitan areas would be an attractive location for industries, since that is where most of their customers, as well as their input suppliers, are located. However, once a country opens up to trade, the optimum location may change.
