A Common Strangeness: Contemporary Poetry, Cross-Cultural ...

A Common Strangeness comes to an end with a chapter on the American poet Charles Bernstein, one of the founders of so-called LANGUAGE poetry. Edmond picks up on a debate around Bernstein's essay "Poetics of the Americas," where he praises the heterodox language uses of multicultural and to a lesser extent international Englishes claiming them for what he envisions as a centrifugal (pushing out, away from a center) poetics distinct from the centripetal force of nationalism and identity ...

But the book is also a long essay on the relation between the general and the particular. It explores what it is possible to say about poetry, or the global, in the face of the poem and the individual. Instead of dichotomies, it offers a triangulated, multilingual, comparative approach to literary studies.
