In the Tudor and Stuart time witchcraft was a very big issue, it was associated with death and pain, no one thought witches were good. Witches would be tried and punished, often the people would be accused maybe because every one hated them. Now we would think if they were a witch, they would use magic to get themselves out of this situation.

Witchcraft in Tudor and Stuart England - A-Level History ...

All witches were equal under Tudor law, it seemed, but some were more equal than others. Indeed, it was not until after James I came to the throne in 1603, with his treatise Daemonologie and his fear of the supernatural, that the witch-hunting craze in England really took off.
