Chapter 4

This chapter is full of details about Winston's work life: from the speakwrite, a contraption into which Winston speaks the articles that will be later written (speaking and writing here considered opposites), to the memory holes in which "records" are thrown, not to be remembered and documented, but to be destroyed. The reader should note that Orwell consistently names items, processes, and events antithetically to their intents, results, and purposes and thereby makes Winston's world more ...

Chapter 4 Summary: "People Are Hard to Hate Close Up. Move In.". In a cultural climate dominated by divisive politics and unrelenting media coverage, conversations have veered away from civility, truth, accountability, and authentic identity. At the same time, on the micro level, individuals who maintain a sense of true belonging remain "zoomed in" to the world, advocate their truth, and most importantly, form "opinions of people based on their actual, in-person experiences" (64).
