Medieval Death Ritual Representation Binski

In his book 'Medieval Death: Ritual and Representation' the art historian Paul Binski argues that in the late-medieval period people became more and more afraid of the sufferings after the death. Combining the harsh time of recurring plagues, the growing importance of penitence and the old Christian rejection of the body made the macabre art of fourteenth century flourish.

Receiving even more critical attention was Binski's Medieval Death: Ritual and Representation. Before Christian ideals about death and resurrection became prominent, cultures such as those of the Roman and Jewish traditions saw the body of the dead as corrupt, and so it is not depicted in their visual arts.

Binski's scholarly work examines how medieval Christian society coped with the ultimate fact of life. Some of his attention centers around the theology of death and the dead, e.g., hell, purgatory, heaven, expiation of sin, chantries for prayers, the meaning of resurrection, intercession by saints. Some focuses on funeral monuments and artistic representations of the dead, and on such popular concepts (or events) as the last judgment and the weighing of souls.
