Simmel was one of the first generation of German sociologists: his neo-Kantian approach laid the foundations for sociological antipositivism, asking 'What is society?' in a direct allusion to Kant's question 'What is nature?', presenting pioneering analyses of social individuality and fragmentation. For Simmel, culture referred to

Georg Simmel on Individuality and Social Forms, Simmel, Levine

Simmel always begins and ends with the individual. He assumes that the individual is born with certain ways of thinking and feeling and most social interactions are motivated by individual needs and desires. Encounters with others are molded to social forms in order to facilitate reciprocal exchanges. These forms constitute society for Simmel. Objective culture is that culture that is universal yet not alive to the individual's subjective experience.

Cultural Reader: Georg Simmel on society and the individual

Georg Simmel stressed both the connection as well as the tensions between the individual and society. In his opinion an individual is both a product of society as well as the link in all-social processes that take place in society. The relationship between an individual and the society is dual in nature.

Sociology of Georg Simmel

Simmel believed that humans were essentially actors who could adapt to changing social structures that interacted with their world. The ability to adapt would affect how creative structures were maintained by every individual. This means that social and cultural structures have their own individuality. Relationships.

The individual in a social unit must be an entity or constituent part of the unit, and Simmel distinguishes between a personal self and a social self. If there is no self-consciousness, symbolic interaction would disappear and human experience would just be the responses to stimuli. Instead, we live and die in terms of what is inter subjectively meaningful -- i.e. view ourselves in terms of responses of others - and even on others who we have never met.

Notes on Georg Simmel - University of Regina

Simmel focused on these forms of association while paying little attention to individual consciousness. Simmel believed in the creative consciousness that can be found in diverse forms of interaction, which he observed both the ability of actors to create social structures, as well as the disastrous effects such structures had on the creativity of individuals. Simmel also believed that social and cultural structures come to have a life of their own.

Simmel seeks to explain human nature and how it plays a part in society. Man's nature, originally good and common to all, should develop unhampered. In addition to more liberty, the nineteenth century demanded the functional specialization of man and his work; this specialization makes one individual incomparable to another, and each of them indispensable to the highest possible extent.
