Two final points are worth identifying as fundamental science and technology governance issues. First, it is noteworthy that different actors within society hold different viewpoints. It is important to understand the framework within which perceptions of the major issues are framed.

Governance of Science and Technology

The committees established by the National Research Council (NRC) to issue consensus reports on controversial or emerging science and technology issues provide another relevant point of comparison. Both the proposed GCCs and the NRC committees seek to provide a credible, honest-broker forum for addressing controversy, but they do it in quite different, if complementary, ways.
